

Please do not write on this handout. Return to Mr. Aitken to reuse in other classes.

George Washington Bush

George Washington Bush was born around 1780, the son of an African American servant and an Irish maid. While many pioneers earned reputations as rugged individualists, Bush epitomized compassion and selflessness, traits that helped him become one of the most important leaders of the first group of Americans to settle in what is now Washington State. A veteran of the War of 1812, Bush traveled to the Pacific Coast in 1820, found work as a freelance trapper, and eventually became employed with the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1830, he returned to Missouri, married Isabella James, a German-American and minister's daughter, raised five sons (their sixth was born in Washington Territory), and worked the family farm. Although quite successful as a farmer in Missouri, Bush's family was still the target of racial prejudice. Missouri was a slave state. That inspired him to return to the West and start a new life in Oregon Territory.

In May 1844, Bush partnered with Michael Simmons, a man from the same hometown as his wife, and they led a thirty-two-person party over the perilous Oregon Trail. Although Bush and Simmons had the money to finance their journey, many of their fellow travelers did not. Demonstrating the compassion and charitable nature for which he would become known, Bush personally funded those of his party who could not afford to make it on their own. His ancestors claim he hid more than $2000 worth of silver under the floorboards of a wagon (more than $65,000 today, adjusted for inflation). After four months, the wagon train arrived in Oregon.

Unfortunately, the policies of racism had beat him to the West. In June 1844, Oregon's Provisional Government enacted the first of a series of exclusion laws, commonly known as the "Lash Law." Through such legislation, citizens of Oregon Territory used violence and intimidation to prohibit African Americans from owning land.

Refusing to be separated by racist politics, Bush and Simmons temporarily settled on the north bank of the Columbia River, a region under the direction of the British-owned Hudson's Bay Company and so less subject to the Provisional Government's laws. During the summer of 1845, Bush moved his family to present-day Tumwater (the first permanent American settlement in what would become Washington State), staked out a 640-acre claim, and (with Simmons) opened the region's first gristmill and sawmill. On his farm, Bush grew vegetable crops, fruit trees, and grain, all of which he willingly shared with those in need. He is credited with saving his neighbors from a famine during the winter of 1852. New settlers often arrived in the area exhausted, and out of food and supplies. Bush was known to generously give supplies to settlers and seeds to start new farms.

“The man divided out nearly his whole crop to new settlers who came with or without money.... ‘Pay me in kind next year,’ he would say to those in need; and to those who had money he would say, ‘Don't take too much...just enough to do you’; and in this wise divided his large crop and became a benefactor to the whole community.”

- Ezra Meeker, 1853

In 1846, with the extension of Oregon Territory to the 49th parallel and the formation of a formal territorial government with jurisdiction north of the Columbia River, Bush was once again confronted with the law that prevented him from owning land, and he faced losing everything he had worked for.

However, Bush's friends and neighbors rallied to his aid and petitioned the United States Congress. It took years of effort, but on January 30, 1855, Congress passed a special act that allowed the Bush family to retain their property holdings.

George Washington Bush died in 1863, but not before he left behind a legacy of decency and compassion that reverberated through his community for decades to come.

Bush settled near present-day Tumwater

[Excerpt from oregonencyclopedia.org, edited by Mr. Aitken for school use.]